Personal Statements

Personal statements are staples in applications for graduate and professional school, and may be required for applications for service programs, fellowships, and more. Personal statements, a 1-2 page document sometimes referred to as a goals statement or a statement of purpose, may be intimidating to write, but here are some tips to make sure you’re on the right track.

• Get the attention of your reader.
  - Your personal statement should hook your reader as soon as possible: the opening paragraph is vital to getting your reader’s attention.
  - Tell your story of why you are applying to this school/program, and use it to help yourself stand out and be memorable in a good way.

• Highlight your motivations for applying.
  - Make it clear that you are actively applying to this school/program, not avoiding the world of work.
  - Be specific – what about this specific school/program are you interested in?

• Highlight what makes you stand out.
  - Focus on your accomplishments, as well as obstacles you have overcome.
  - Highlight achievements relevant to the school/program.
  - Mention specific courses that are especially meaningful.

• Watch out for the balance between breadth and depth.
  - Discuss extracurricular activities within the field. Do not be worried if lower in number—it matters more that the experiences are meaningful and ongoing vs. numerous and brief.

• Maintain a positive and confident tone.
  - While you may need to address a low GPA or weak test score, do it briefly. Don’t let it overpower the positive qualifications you have.

• Address any specific questions outlined in the application.
  - If the school or program has identified certain questions, be sure to address them in your personal statement.

• Write creatively, but clearly and concisely.
  - Adhere to any length requirements outlined by the school or program.
  - Have your essay reviewed by trusted faculty, advisors, school writing center for feedback and suggestions.
